

Extensions

BEHAVIORAL: The behavioral/emotional framework can have what is known as over-extensions. This means that intensity levels within the emotional framework can pose a danger to the self and others if not brought into the rational mind for evaluation and adjustment.

MOTIVATIONAL: The seven value elements associated with our learned desires can pose a danger to the self and others if not recognized and adjusted through an understanding of our emotions and the integrations associated with what we want and what we need.

Behavioral Over-Extensions:

First of all; in order to understand the over extensions and their effect on our psychic energy, we must differentiate between the concealed and intended behaviors. Concealed measurements measure character traits. These are largely unconscious emotions that underlie our behavior actions—these are not seen by other people. These traits function as evaluative and energy giving and are depicted as Dominance, Inducement, Submission, and Compliance.

Intended measurements are conscious actions observable by others selected by our conscious mind to meet the objectives of our shared existence in relationships, work, or any public venue (such as a library, a wedding, or a funeral). These are our intensions which in turn will trigger our actions. They are observed by others in the following orientations: taking, attracting, responding, and preserving.

Over Extended Concealed Behavioral Patterns:

Over extensions associated with our natural patterns reveal our emotions, feelings, and passions within a separate existence. In other words, these are desires that are only associated with our inner self and not outside influences. When our emotional intensity levels become over-intense such as above 89 on a DISC scale, we can become a danger to “ourselves” not others because the concealed dimension is inner directed within our unconscious mind. A “C” factor that drops below 12 on the DISC scale will pose a threat to the self because a massive lack of attention is given to one’s own direction and decisions.

Over Extended Intended Behavioral Patterns:

Over extensions associated with our intended actions reveal our intensions towards another individual, entity, or mechanism (such as a workplace, a person, or a thing such as a tool that isn’t working properly). These actions generated by our perceived solution to the problems associated with the differences between what they want and what we desire for ourselves. This is known as the Human Problem. Overextensions within this dimension become a danger to others and not ourselves. This is because we have learned to adjust our behaviors as we “react” to external people, things, and circumstances and have created behavioral patterns.

Over Extended Motivational Patterns:

Over extended motivational patterns can create excessive needs within our desire framework. In other words, what we desire may conflict with what we might or might not actually do in each circumstance. For example; if our need to control our space is excessive (such as an elevated political value of 85) but our concealed anger emotion is under-extended (such as an 8), then wanting to be in control is much easier than “taking” control because the anger emotion is the only emotion associated with a taking orientation.

Under extensions can be equally troublesome given our intended or concealed states. Not all extensions whether over or under pose a problem, but most will. Understanding the chemistry involved with specific behavioral and emotional frameworks and how they integrate with one another will ensure an accurate description of what one can expect from any behavioral and motivational dynamic.
